Communication skills

You do not necessarily have a say in every downcoming, issue, or problem.

* If you have an opinion on any of that, it is not necessarily necessary to express it, and if you want to express it, it is not necessarily necessary to express it to anyone or on every occasion.

- * And if you show it, it is not necessarily that you cramp in its presentation, or be fanatic about it, or think that it is a right that is not invalid from its hands or from behind it.
- * And if one of the people disagrees with you, it is not necessarily that the disagreement is an enemy, a stalker, or an envy.
- * And not necessarily if you criticize anyone of you for seeking to injure him, overthrow him, abuse him, and strip him of every good deed.
- * Not necessarily, if you disagree with someone, that they are hostile to him, call for his enmity, and publicize him as much as you can.
- * It is not necessary if you have a rivalry between you and someone to transfer this rivalry to everyone who contacts you, bearing the slogan: (with me or against me).
It is sufficient for the litigation to be confined to its owners as possible.
- * It is not necessary if you wrote an article, or a poem, that its words, pages, or verses be prolonged, but it is sufficient for this idea to arrive.
- * It is not necessary that if you speak, enter, or express a point of view to increase with words, then it weighs on the listeners or those present without justification for that as long as the purpose of the words has been achieved, and because it is said: (If only he continued, it is better than to say: If only he kept silent).
If this slogan took its luck from many souls, we would be safe from the repetition and overburdening, the headache of prolonging and tiredness.
